

IATL Rule of Law Definition As of April 2024

The International Academy of Trial Lawyers steadfastly advocates for, and defends, the Rule of Law. In doing so, we refer to the principle that all persons, institutions, and entities (including corporations and governments in any form)

- are subject to law;
- have access to the protections of and rights established through the law regardless of economic means; and
- may have their or its actions challenged in, and may be held accountable before, a court of law.

This system requires that the legal profession operates independently and without interference from others, ensuring the greatest possible access to legal protections and remedies.

Further, we hold that to conform to the Rule of Law, laws must be:

- clearly defined, easily accessible and legally certain;
- established through a transparent process that is open to debate and discussion;
- prospective in nature;
- consistent with internationally recognized human rights principles;
- enforceable through a court of law where disputes are timely adjudicated by an independent and impartial judiciary, and may include decision-making by a group of impartial citizens, on the basis of evidence applied to established law, free from case-related bias or ethical conflicts; and
- impartially enforced by the state.
